China_, which chronicled the history of the jigsaw puzzle craze in China, from its introduction to the present day. In the Spring of 2014 Julia visited Xi'an and made two stops there: Food Architecture in China: Old French Confectionery This slideshow requires JavaScript. Doors to many of Xi'an's ancient buildings originally contained secret compartments in which food could be hidden for the consumption of deserving VIPs. To feed its smaller ruler, the giant tomb of Emperor Qin Shi Huang contained more than 5,500 stoves, but Xi'an is renowned for its marble pastry shops, appropriately located just off the West Gate. Inside they are filled with rich chocolates, mini filled pastries, and pastries and cakes for men (there are no women). You'll be taken on a culinary tour of the city through the gate and its immediate surroundings, looking up at local art on the walls, and down into twisting alleyways to visit local pastry shops. Closed Mondays. Duration approximately 7 hours. Food Architecture in China: Xiao Long Bao (Steamed, Caviar-Style Dumplings) This slideshow requires JavaScript. Alas, Xi'an does not have more ethnic food than any other Chinese city, nor is there an abundance of food from the Muslim Uighur or Tibetan people. There are no kebabs, fish rolls, or mutton skewers to be had (though there are plenty of fish). Xi'an has famous dumplings, however. They are steamed and served slightly sweet and salty with chili, and they have a familiar shape and style. Some have a fondness for pork, others have no bias—they enjoy sticking to their principles. They all share a common dough, wrapped around a pork filling, and steamed. This slideshow requires JavaScript. The flavorings change from region to region, but two are especially popular—shredded fresh or fried bean curd (a savory, fatty type of tofu) and _zongzi_—sweet, steamed and spiked with chili peppers. They are plump and soft, with a pleasing texture and finish. _Guanxi_ (personal relationships) are a must, and some who have been to Xi'an might best explain what that means. It doesn't matter how you spend your time—if you can spend some with the family of a local, you can learn more of the back story of Xi'an
