Admission for treatment of anemia in pregnant women. Severe anemia is still a major cause of maternal morbidity and mortality in pregnancy. This study examined clinical features of patients who were admitted to the medical, obstetrics and neonatal intensive care units of a tertiary care obstetrics and gynecology hospital between 2003 and 2004. All patients received detailed medical histories and assessments of hemoglobin concentration and clinical signs/symptoms of anemia. Target hemoglobin levels, anemia management strategies and the level of satisfaction with care were also assessed. The frequency of anemia during pregnancy was 26.8%, mostly mild (50.3%), moderate (34.9%), or severe (10.8%). Patients with mild or moderate anemia were admitted for an average of 16 ± 11 days (range 2-74 days), while patients with severe anemia were admitted for an average of 12 ± 8 days (range 2-34 days). Forty-six percent of patients with moderate and 11% of those with mild anemia were admitted to the NICU. Heparin-free low molecular weight heparin (LMWH) was preferred by 67% of patients for the prophylaxis of thrombosis. Overall, 72% of patients were satisfied with the care they received at the hospital. Anemia is common among pregnant patients. This study suggests that it should be treated with LMWH prophylaxis in cases of moderate to severe anemia during pregnancy. Evaluation of three animal models of chronic pulmonary hypertension. The evaluation of the hemodynamic and morphologic features of pulmonary hypertension (PH) in various animal models is essential in deciphering its pathogenesis. Prospective evaluation of three different animal models of chronic PH. Sixteen sheep were used in this study. After isolation of their pulmonary vessels, a series of ex vivo experiments were performed. In all, 14 animals completed the study. Three types of PH were induced: (1) progressive PH with degeneration of proximal pulmonary arteries (n = 7), (2) systemic RV hypertrophy with PH (n = 5), and (3) bilateral pneumonectomy and left pulmonary artery sten 6d1f23a050
